In the late 1880s, Alfred Stieglitz's father bought a large property on Lake George in upstate New York, a popular resort area for upper-class New Yorkers. While Stieglitz's parents and siblings spent their summers at the lakeside villa, Stieglitz and Georgia O'Keeffe stayed at a farmhouse on the estate. The property was a constant in his life, serving as a retreat from the bustle of New York City and a source of lasting inspiration.

The Alfred Stieglitz Collection | Lake George

The first exhibition devoted exclusively to the work created by American master photographer Alfred Stieglitz (1864-1946) at Lake George, New York—including many works never before published or shown— Alfred Stieglitz at Lake George examines the most personal and radical work of the artist's career: images of his family and closest friends, including his wife, the painter Georgia O'Keeffe, and his responses to the landscape surrounding his family home.

Stieglitz was fifty-eight years old when he made this photograph at his family's estate in Lake George, New York, where he spent his summers from childhood to old age. At the turn of the twentieth century, it had seemed to him that photography, if it were to become an art, must emulate the other arts and so restrain or disguise its earthbound realism.
